Preparing for the Future: Advance Care Planning

Advance care planning lets patients take charge of their healthcare by sharing their preferences and goals ahead of time. This means your independence and wishes are respected, even if you can't make decisions later.

Be sure to share with your loved ones, healthcare team, and healthcare proxy what is important to you. By writing down your preferences, you can make sure your medical wishes are known and followed.

Guide to Advance Care Planning

This guide helps provide a starting point for patients to make important decisions about their healthcare preferences. Remember, it's important to include your loved ones, healthcare team, and healthcare proxy in these discussions.

Choose a Healthcare Proxy

Pick someone you trust to be your healthcare proxy or medical power of attorney. This person will make medical decisions for you if you can't, so talk to them about your wishes for your care.

Share Your Personal Values

Think about what matters most to you, including your beliefs, culture, and any religious or spiritual preferences. What is important to you? Tell your healthcare team and loved ones about these values, as they can help guide your treatment and end-of-life care. Make sure your values are written down in your advance care planning documents.

Determine Your Treatment Preferences

Discuss options like pain relief, surgery, chemotherapy, radiation, immunotherapy, and clinical trials with your healthcare team. Consider the benefits, risks, side effects, and how each treatment might affect your quality of life.

Evaluate End-of-Life Care Options and Preferences

Talk about end-of-life care options and preferences with your healthcare team. Decide when you wish to proceed with medical services such as resuscitation (CPR), intubation (help breathing with a tube), and artificial feeding and hydration.

Document Your Decisions

Your decisions need to be written down in an advance directive or living will. These legal documents explain your wishes for medical treatment if you can't speak for yourself. Share copies with your healthcare team, healthcare proxy, and loved ones.

Review and Update Regularly

Look at your advance care planning documents often, especially if your health changes, new treatment options are recommended, or other life circumstances have changed. Update them as needed to show your current wishes.
